Navigating an International Development Job Search

Understanding the Current Landscape

The international development sector is undergoing significant disruption and transformation. And yet global challenges such as climate change, conflict, pandemics, and widening inequalities will only continue to increase the demand for skilled professionals over the coming years. The job market, especially in Washington, D.C., remains highly competitive and challenging, but there are options out there for those who broaden their approach and their horizons.

Let's clarify some key considerations:

- This evolving environment is not a reflection of your abilities, choices, experience, or previous organization—it is a systemic shift.
- Traditional career choices such as USAID, implementing partners, etc, as well as career paths are changing, requiring adaptability, innovation, and new approaches.
- We need a more entrepreneurial mindset to our job prospects and possible career opportunities in areas such as social entrepreneurship, leveraging technology, or exploring emerging sectors.

Job Search Strategies Basics

- It starts with mindset. Each day, set aside time to reflect on the moments in your career that brought you the greatest satisfaction. Identify your core values, non-negotiables, and key strengths. Revisit your résumé through that lens—pinpoint the roles, projects, and people that contributed most to your professional fulfillment. Use those insights to create a targeted list of organizations and individuals operating in those spaces, and begin reaching out to contacts within or adjacent to your network who align with that vision.
- Seek out a Career Coach: A professional career coach can provide guidance tailored to your strengths and goals. Check out the Coaching Collaborative.
- Join a Career Circle: Platforms like www.Phyl.org or Career Pivot offer structured job search support.
- Use a Targeted Approach: Conduct broad industry analysis, then narrow your focus through networking and informational interviews. AI can help with both broadening and refining your search.
- Leverage Networks & Alumni Connections: Your professional and educational networks can be invaluable in opening doors.
- Continue Your Development Experience through International Service: If you are open to relocating, consider programs like Peace Corps or Peace Corps Response \(one-year model for experienced professionals\), which offer full healthcare, government service credit, and global networks. Similar shorter international service models include www.richmondvale.org

Emerging Job Opportunities in Different Sectors

Trends in International Development Hiring

- Foreign Assistance Funding: Although budgets are shifting under the State Department, funding is not disappearing—there may be opportunities in the coming year as the new development architecture is restructured under the State Department and other agencies.
- Go Where the Need Is: Development professionals are still in demand, particularly in crisis response, humanitarian aid, and digital transformation. See the list of top development job sites below.
- Fellowships vs. Consultancy or Graduate School: Consider fellowships as a way to gain experience and expand networks before committing to consulting or further education. See the list of 40 fellowship opportunities below.
- Social Entrepreneurship: Create your own opportunities—volunteer, establish an NGO, or launch a local community initiative. See the list of social entrepreneur funds and programs below.
- Impact Investing or Philanthropy: If you are more experienced in your career, there is a lot more demand being put on the philanthropic and impact investing sectors and thus new job opportunities. See the list below.

Simplifying Networking & Making a Lasting Impression

Maximizing Networking Success

1. Create your list: Identify your dream organizations, positions, and who is working there.
2. Use a relationship-based job search as the best use of your time. Use both your strong and your “weak” ties. Strength of Weak Ties Past or weak ties help you generate new networks that can be of help. ID folks in your relationship base. Make a list of who is in the strong and weak networks, and then reach out to them on LinkedIn, etc. Focus on “connectors”.
3. Utilize LinkedIn (Premium Recommended): Find first- and second-degree connections within target organizations. Your alumni and affinity networks are your superpower. Reach out to people in your networks to help you get past the gatekeeper and get introduced directly to key people.
4. Secure Informational Interviews:
 - Request a 20-minute conversation (not 30 minutes – they won’t give you that).
 - Research the organization and person in advance to come in prepared with questions and basic awareness of the person and organization.
 - Prepare insightful questions demonstrating your knowledge. (What do you see as trends in the industry? What do you like and what is most challenging about this job/org? What type of people are succeeding in this org? What info sources are you using to stay current? How did you approach getting into this org/position?)
 - Clearly articulate your interest, experience, and career goals.
 - Ask for one specific referral of someone else they recommend you talk to (don’t ask for a “few” or “anyone” – you won’t get any) to continue expanding your network.
 - Follow up: Send a thank-you note and include your resume. (ensure your bullets align with their KSAs)
5. Track Your Progress: Maintain a spreadsheet of contacts, leads, and follow-up actions.

Recommended Job Search Resources

One excellent job search book by Phyl Terry ““Never Search Alone” offers an excellent set of tools/tips/processes, including a checklist for those who have recently lost or left a job.

Phyl's Key Strategy Methodology:

1. B1. Build Your Job Search Council (JSC): Instead of searching alone, create a small group of 3–5 fellow job-seekers with whom to work through the “never search alone” method together.. It is not important that you know these people ahead of time – in fact, it’s often helpful to work with new people. (You can create a group yourself or register as an independent job-seeker via phyl.org.) The JSC helps with decision-making, motivation, and networking.

2. Conduct a Personal & Professional Inventory: Reflect on career goals, strengths, and values. Identify key accomplishments and skills. Define what you’re truly looking for in your next role.

3. Craft Your Job Search Strategy: Develop a target list of companies, industries, or roles that fit your expertise and values. Use a methodical approach rather than responding randomly to job postings. Define specific metrics to measure progress.

4. Engage in Authentic Networking: Shift from a transactional approach to genuine relationship-building. Reconnect with your existing network in a meaningful way. Seek informational interviews rather than just asking for job leads.

5. Master the Interview Process: Prepare for different types of interviews (behavioral, case studies, executive panels, etc.). Use storytelling techniques to highlight your value and impact. Leverage your JSC and even AI for mock interviews and constructive feedback.

6. Handle Rejections & Stay Resilient: Normalize setbacks as part of the process. Use the support of your JSC to maintain motivation and refine your approach. View each rejection as a learning opportunity.

7. Evaluate Offers & Negotiate Effectively: Assess job offers based on alignment with personal and professional priorities. Use negotiation strategies to secure the best possible compensation and role. Get input from your JSC before making a final decision.
